Street robbery is the cause of fear among public. It has an offender a victim. It uses threat and force to steal something or property from a person publicly. The focus of this was to look into street robbery experience of selected Jose Rizal University students, the lessons and strategies they learned. Five students were interviewed, were asked to narrate in writing and reenact their own story as victims of street crime. I predicted that each victim had varied experiences to tell. Each encountered different line of attack from the robber and displayed diverse reactions. However, despite the aftermath of trauma, they were able to recover intellectually, spiritually, psychologically and emotionally. Out of the sad incident, victims were able to develop sense of awareness and prevention among themselves.
